Every word is carefully annotated so that learners have plenty of support (if they need it). You can even click on a word to see how it's used in other videos across the site. Perhaps the most interesting part of FluentU is its –learn mode, which takes videos and turns them into language learning lessons. The lessons are fully personalized, so the student's learning history is taken into account when presenting questions. FluentU's algorithm sets students up for success by teaching them based on what they already know[1].

Drama. This is an ideal way to teach languages. Also, students get an opportunity to express themselves through dialogues and gestures thus improving their imagination and memory. This is one of the meaningful communication activities that can be tried out in any classroom that promotes teamwork. A story or an idea from a subject can be used as the drama theme.

Mobile apps. At present, mobile apps are one of the widely used modes of teaching. Apps like Skype are capable of helping schools to visually bring experts to classrooms and apps like Socrative helps in visualizing student understanding. Other popular mobile apps useful in classrooms include OneNote (a digital note-taking app), Google Classroom, (a free web-based platform to save time and paper in classrooms) etc[2].

Games and fun activities are a vital part of teaching English as a foreign language. Whether you're teaching adults or children, games will liven up your lesson and ensure that your students will leave the classroom wanting more.

Language learning is a hard task which can sometimes be frustrating. Constant effort is required to understand, produce and manipulate the target language. Wellchosen games are invaluable as they give students a break and at the same time allow students to practice language skills. Games are highly motivating since they are amusing and at the same time challenging. Furthermore, they employ meaningful and useful language in real contexts. They also encourage and increase cooperation. Games are highly motivating because they are amusing and interesting. They can be used to give practice in all language skills and be used to practice many types of communication. Games can be used to warm up the class before your lesson begins, during the lesson to give students a break when you're tackling a tough subject, or at the end of class when you have a few minutes left to kill. There are literally hundreds, probably thousands, of games that you can play with your students. Learning vocabulary through games is one effective and interesting way that can be applied in any classrooms. The results of our research suggest that games are used not only for mere fun, but more importantly, for the useful practice and review of language lessons, thus leading toward the goal of improving learners' communicative competence. There are some well spread games:

Where are you? This one makes for a noisy few minutes, but it's worth it! This game provides the kids with lots of opportunities to practice listening and speaking in the target language. Create groups with three or four members and assign them a specific word or phrase. If you have a smaller class, or if you just want students to take longer to finish the game, consider having pairs instead. (The smaller the groups, the longer the game. You'll soon discover why.) The assigned word or phrase will be the group's cattle call. They'll bellow out those words or phrases as soon as the game starts. Why? Oh, because the students will be blindfolded and mixed with other groups. The goal is to find all their members as quickly as possible. At the sound of a whistle, everyone tries to locate their group by calling out to them using their cattle call. And these target words or phrases could be anything. For example, in a Spanish class, you can use greetings: Buenos días! (Good morning!), Adios! (Bye!) or –¿Cómo estás?! (How are you?). You can also use Spanish colors, days of the week, numbers, etc. The words don't even have to belong to the same category or topic.

The important thing is that your students are actually walking and talking in the target language. They're also honing their ears while listening for it. Instruct the class to raise their hands if they think they've rounded up every last member of their team.

The first one to do this wins! You can have several rounds of the game and assign different words for the groups each time. That'll give the kids more time to practice more words. You can play this inside the classroom or outdoors. Just make sure to clear the area from objects that may cause kids to stumble. Also, be on the lookout for –strays, or kids who venture too far from herd. This is a fun game that'll easily become your students' favorite.

2. The boat is sinking (with a twist) We all know this classic. The teacher cries, –The boat is sinking! The boat is sinking! Group yourselves into three!! The kids then scamper and assemble themselves accordingly. Students who fail to find a huddle with the appropriate number of members are then sent packing. This is repeated until the two last remaining souls on-board are declared winners.

The twist comes with the creativity of the grouping instructions. It's not just about numbers. Groups can be formed by gender, shirt color, letters in students' first names, etc. It all depends on your target vocabulary. You can even transition into a TPR-style (Total Physical Response) activity and encourage your kids to get moving by, for example, saying, –The boat is sinking! The boat is sinking! Everybody, jump three times!! This game can be used to have restless kids up and about. It also allows you to have a comprehension check to see whether your wards have understood specific instructions barked in the target language. So for beginners, use simple, plain instructions[3].

This game isn't one of kindergarten classroom games since it requires your students to be able to read in English. So, if you teach at school and girls and boys in your class know English letters and can read the words, this is an excellent game to develop reading and logical skills.

Plus, it is one of the best group games that will teach your students to work in a team. What do you need for the game? – Several sets of sentences. You'll need to print them out and cut into separate words in advance. Game rules:

Divide the class into several teams.

Give each team a hat/bag/box (any suitable container) with the sentences cut into pieces. Kids need to put the words into correct order to get a sentence.

The team that gets their sentence right faster than others wins.

Note: you can mix several sentences in one container to make this ESL activity more difficult. Don't forget to take the level of your students into account before you do it[4].

In the end, I am a student. I am not well-experienced and knowledgeable to teach pupils how to instruct learning foreign languages, especially English. You know kids have extremely sensitive and influential character so that they know a teacher or a person who teach and become together how their quality and of course, appearance very well. The reason why of not appearing bad impression and effect, I have an effort to pay attention to my clothing and how to instruct them to learn language interestingly for get more motivation, I use games in order to comprehend theme, words during lesson. Honestly, they expect my lesson when to begin and how themes they learn today that I find games are fundamental and effective method to interest in studying subjects, despite of old method. Games also help the teacher to create contexts in which language is useful and meaningful. The learners want to take part and in order to do so must understand what others are saying or have written, and they must speak or write in order to express their own points of view or give information. I think that this article help you to teach students with intriguing games for their effective and cooperative learning.
