Independent work, especially with a foreign language, takes on a new meaning at a higher level. The prerequisites for the lesson are different at this stage than they were at previous stages. Because most of the language's material is passively examined at this point, the lesson can no longer be seen via the lens of oral communication (without a prescription). Reading comprehension, in other words, plays a major influence. Textiles are similarly big in size, with a sophisticated language. Exercises in reading, speaking, and listening are continually improved. Reading gets its own day, speaking gets its own day, and writing gets its own day in the instructional plan. Tasks assigned to the House become increasingly sophisticated as the game progresses. A subject is put in the middle of the Speaking lessons, and a 2-minute speech is timed. In another technique, readers are given cards with text themes written on them. Each student conveys his or her own viewpoint on the subject by writing it on the card of his or her choice. In speech, the previously described combinations, phraseology components, introductory words, new words, and synonyms must all be used.

To summarize, all of the aforementioned types of activities should be given to the teacher first to comprehend the grammatic content on the subject, and then then to utilize it to clarify and reinforce the material as an engaging and effective way to teach mathematics to students.
